Coloríginz organises Organic Day

By Olga Keijser

Last month, we organised the Coloríginz Organic Day: an inspiring event where organic growers and market parties came together to share knowledge, insights and ambitions. What stood out most was the genuine interest and engagement of all participants. The energy in the room showed that organic is no longer a niche topic, but a shared movement that everyone actively wants to contribute to.

During the sessions, valuable insights were gained from both the wholesale and florist segment, as well as the supermarket segment. Open discussions took place about opportunities, challenges and what is concretely needed to further grow organic flowers structurally.

In the coming period, we will:

- Map organic production per grower
- Develop a clear weekly product calendar
- Engage with a select group of interested customers to better align supply and demand

The aim is to continue acting as a central link between growers and the market, enabling us to jointly build a broader and stronger organic assortment.
